Your overall raw score (total number of questions answered correctly) is converted to a standard score for the purpose of providing relative interpretations (i.e., so that your scores can be compared to a reference group of Canadian-educated candidates who took the Written Component for the first time).

The average standard score for all Canadian-educated candidates taking the exam for the first time is set to 500 with a standard deviation of 100. If your standard score is higher than 500, you can interpret this to mean that your exam performance was better than the average performance of Canadian-educated candidates taking the exam for the first time.

Note that score transformation does not change the interpretation of whether you have passed the exam; that is, if your raw score on the exam meets or exceeds the passing score, your standard score will also meet or exceed the passing score.

Sincerely,

CAPR | ACORP
